Whilst I am not a researcher, policy-maker or informed citizen regarding koalas, I am a very avid environmentalist very saddened by the massive destruction of habitat and species that has been taking place in Australia for decades. I commend the move to establish a Koala Strategy. I noticed that most of the venues offering information sessions are on the east coast. I live in Armidale, and there are known koala communities in that area. I would like to put forward the suggestion of using wildlife corridors for koalas and other wildlife that can extend right up and down the whole of the east coast, and other relevant inland areas. I would also like the government to not only minimise koala disturbance with new freeway construction, but eliminate all disturbance. Show the world that we actually care about our wildlife, that we value it above getting cards from A to B faster, or above spending a few extra dollars on taking the cheapest route. Make the route more scenic and the tourists will stop to look. If we don't act soon, we'll have another Reef trauma on our hands, which certainly won't be good for tourism.
